Norton, William R., Collector

William R. Norton Photograph Collection, ca. 1890-1920

PCA 226

888 photographs, b&w, a few tinted

Completely revised: 2003 by K. Shelton
Revised by: Connie Hamann and Jacki
Swearingen, June 2015

ACQUISITION: Two donations comprise this collection. Bea Shepard was instrumental in the donations. (Accession #1984-003 and #2002-017)
[See also the other Case & Draper Collection at PCA 39]

ACCESS: The photographs are available for viewing. The photographs may not be photocopied.

COPYRIGHT: Request for permission to publish or reproduce material from the collection should be discussed with the Librarian.

PROCESSING: Originally assembled and described from copy prints in 1989 by India Spartz, all images were re-numbered with the arrival of the original collection in 2002. Copy prints were made from the negatives and other formats – which range from glass plates to lantern slides to “copy” glass plates--received in 2002. Selected 4 x 5 copy negatives are available. The prints are numbered and placed in Mylar inserts for easy handling.

INTRODUCTION

William R. Norton collected these images while a resident in Juneau. He passed the images on to Bea Shepard who subsequently donated the collection to the Alaska Historical Collections and contributed the following biography of Mr. Norton:

William R. Norton lived almost his entire life in Juneau, having come here with his parents, Roy and Louise Norton, in 1912 when he was two years old. Bill's father worked as a power plant operator at Thane, Salmon Creek, and the Mendenhall Glacier during the years that Bill was in school in Juneau. Bill could tell many tales about just getting to school - coming down the flume from the dam at Salmon Creek, using a rowboat to cross the Mendenhall River. (There was no bridge across the river in those days, and the school was on the other side of the river from where he lived.) He graduated from Juneau High School and started working immediately for AEL&P, as a meter reader. He claimed that the best way to get acquainted with the people in a town was to be a meter reader. He discovered an interest in and talent for electricity, and learned the business from the ground up by working for the power company and Parsons Electric. Ultimately he worked for the Rural Electrification Association Coop in Auke Bay, doing most of the installation and acting as manager, maintenance, business manager, etc. for twelve years. He worked for AJ Industries and Alaska Electric again before retiring in 1974.

One of Bill's interests and hobbies was photography. He was particularly interested in the work of W. H. Case. Case's daughter Madge suggested that he go through the glass plates that she had and take the ones he wanted. He picked out approximately 800 of the plates, with the hope that he could work with them during the time of his retirement. Unfortunately, his health was not good enough for him to do this. He died after a long illness in May 1980.

Case & Draper

The work of photographers William H. Case and Herbert Horace Draper offers a glimpse of early twentieth-century Alaska. Fueled by the excitement of the Klondike Gold Rush, they opened a studio in Skagway in 1898 and later another in Juneau. Their clientele included businesses, newspapers, local residents, and tourists. The partnership dissolved in 1907, but both men continued to operate their own photography and curio shops as until their deaths.

The backbone of Case and Draper's work was steamship tourism, which had flourished in Alaska since the 1880s. They sold postcards and prints of Alaskan archetypes by the thousands: Natives and their arts, rustic towns and industries, fisherman and miners. Some images, reprinted in books and articles for almost a century, have become familiar icons of the North.

William H. Case

Born in Marshalltown, Iowa, April 19, 1868, William H. Case spent his boyhood there and in South Dakota. He later moved to Astoria, Oregon, where he possibly met his future business partner, Herbert Horace Draper. Case arrived in the boomtown of Skagway, Alaska in the spring of 1898, presumably to cash in on the Klondike Gold Rush by offering photography services to the crowds of miners. He and his partner, H. H. Draper, operated a photography studio in Skagway for the next ten years.

Case traveled more extensively than Draper, to other towns, mines and canneries around Southeast Alaska and Prince William Sound. Case also collected Native arts, called curios at that time, which were a staple in Case and Draper's store.

In 1908 the partnership dissolved and William Case moved to Juneau to operate his own shop specializing in photography and curios. He remained active in the community until he died from heart failure on July 16, 1920, at the age of 52. As a Thirty-second Degree Mason, Case's funeral was conducted by the Masonic Lodge. His immediate survivors included his wife and three children: Madge, Alice, and Howard.

Herbert Horace Draper

Herbert Horace Draper was born in Rockford, Illinois on July 5, 1855. At nineteen, he accompanied his parents to the Pacific Coast and settled in Salem, Oregon. When he was 22, Draper moved to Michigan but subsequently returned to Oregon and eventually settled in Bellingham, Washington, where he worked as a commercial agent.

In the spring of 1898, at age 43, Draper arrived in Skagway at the height of the stampede to the Klondike. There he opened a photography business with William H. Case. There is no indication that Draper was a practicing photographer prior to meeting Case.

Draper and his wife Harriet, a local teacher, were active in the Skagway community. He served on the city council and as city treasurer. He also held high positions in the Elks Lodge and the Arctic Brotherhood.

Skagway's economy declined after the Gold Rush and Case and Draper dissolved their partnership in 1908. Draper continued operating a business in Skagway under the name of Draper & Company and Case moved his business interests to Juneau.

In June of 1913 Draper contracted severe pneumonia. He passed away at his home on the morning of August 4, 1913, at age 58.

SCOPE AND CONTENTS NOTE

The William R. Norton Collection holds a total of 888 prints made mainly from glass plate negatives. The total of images is greater, since some of the glass plates hold from two to four images, since they are copy negatives. In addition, several images are duplicated, represented by a glass plate, a lantern slide, and a positive glass plate. The quality of the image varies with the medium.

Most images date from 1898 through 1920. They represent the photographs of Case & Draper in Skagway and those of W.H. Case, after his move to Juneau. Subjects of the photographs include Skagway and Juneau, with other locations in Southeast Alaska and the coastal communities of the Gulf of Alaska represented incidentally. Documented are commerce, such as mines, canneries, fisheries, and retail stores; celebrations, such as the Fourth of July parade; people, including businessmen, clergy, Alaska natives and military personnel; transportation and ships; and the new government and towns. Also included are well-known images relating to the shoot-out between Jefferson "Soapy" Smith and Frank Reid in Skagway, portraits of Father Duncan of Metlakatla, and Governor Clark signed the Women's Suffrage Bill in 1913. In addition to the Alaska images, the collection contains 1890s images of Plains Indians (PCA 226-797 to -799 and 226-804 to -839, some signed by Ormsby) and others of American troops, some in Cuba, during the Spanish-American War (PCA 226-869 to -888).

It is obvious that some of these images were not taken by Case, Draper, or Case & Draper. Some are dated 1886, for example, before either photographer came to Alaska. Others are clearly signed by other photographers. In addition, some are not signed at all, making it unclear who may have taken the image. If the photograph is signed, then the name is noted in the following inventory.
